

Anup Gampa is an educator-scholar focusing on the relationship between an individual's psychology and the social, particularly social movements, racism, and capitalism. For example, his research links The Movement for Black Lives with a decrease in White individuals' negative implicit attitudes towards Black people. In one line of research, he is interrogating the relationship between social psychology and capitalism, especially in the way social psychology studies and attempts to fight racism. In another line, Anup is investigating one's willingness to justify the U.S economic system given one's knowledge about wealth inequality in that system. He received his Ph.D. in social psychology from the University of Virginia (2018), where he was awarded the Distinguished Graduate Teaching Award in the Social Sciences.
